This course is now full to capacity. Subject to demand, another course will run over the Summer of 2020, from June - August. Please contact us at flexible@lit.ie to be added to the interest list for this Summer 2020 Offering.

Jungian Psychology with Art Therapy

This programme mixes experiential with the theoretical in a venture that combines Jungian Psychology with Art Therapy. By using methods such as art-making, journaling and dream interpretation we engage creatively with psyche in a journey that promises to be both fascinating and educational. Through experiential learning, the participant will get to know Jung’s model of the psyche, some post-Jungian developments and how to apply such insights in everyday life. For those in the healing professions, the programme should enrich and enliven their existing skills. The Jungian approach is also especially suited to those with an artistic streak and also for practicing artists seeking to discover new ways of creative working. The programme is aimed at those interested in exploring psyche and creativity. It should also be of especial interest for those either in the arts and/or healing professions (psychotherapists, creative therapists, counsellors etc.). Note that a background in arts is not required.

Aims

- Ability to apply an understanding of key concepts of Jung’s model of the psyche to oneself and within a group setting.
- Appreciate art therapy processes and methods, based on experiential and context based learning.
- Articulate creative, analytic and critical insight into personal process by means of written work such as an essay (that includes personal images), and in terms of group dialogue by means of a virtual discussion forum.
- Demonstrate literacy in image interpretation and critically discuss creative expression and artmaking as healing, as applied to key Jungian concepts.
